Tom Sawyer walked far into the country and entered a wood. There he sat down to think about life. Everything was very quiet, and he felt sad. He wondered what he could do in the future. He could be a soldier. Then he could go far away to other countries. He could return after many years and after many battles. He could also join the Red Indians and hunt wild animals. He could travel far away into the great mountains. He could paint his face and wear feathers on his head. He could be a great chief. But no! There was something even better than that. He could get a ship and attack other ships on the sea! He had heard about pirates, and he himself could be a pirate. That was the best option of all! "I'll be a famous pirate," he thought. "When my ship comes home, people will see the black flag. They'll whisper my name. Yes, I'll be a pirate and sail the seas. I'll attack ships and become rich and famous." He could run away from home right now and start his new life, then he could come home in a few years, his dreams already come true, and run into school one morning and surprise the teacher and all the pupils together. He would be the hero of the day! But at half past nine in the evening, as darkness approached, he decided to go back to his aunt's house. Then he drank a glass of milk and went to bed.
